LABELED FOR LIFE

Over 200,000 individuals are on sex offender registries for offenses they committed as children. Registration can last a child's lifetime and cause significant barriers to education, employment, social relationships, and well-being. Although some states have improved registration requirements for youth through legislation, the consequence of labeling a child as a sex offender for any period of time is severe. Leading researchers have studied the impact of registration on young people and their families and have new data demonstrating the harm it causes.

Legislative advocacy is needed—in coordination with litigation—to end youth registration completely.
