Philadelphia's Juveniles for Justice Releases Eye-Opening Publication on Conditions in Institutional Placement for Youth

Youth advocates share their own experiences in detention and placement, highlighting abusive practices

Philadelphia, PA (December 7, 2018): Juveniles for Justice, an advocacy program at Juvenile Law Center for youth with experience in the justice system, today released Broken Bridges. This publication highlights the experiences of the Philadelphia youth in institutional placements. Juveniles for Justice will hold a community event Wednesday, December 19th at the South Philadelphia Free Library to share both the report and their recommendations for reform.

"The most shocking part of this project is that these experiences didn't seem out of the ordinary initially for the youth advocates," said Cathy Moffa, Youth Advocacy Program Manager of Juvenile Law Center, who staffs the program. "They had been treated so horribly for so long in placement that this behavior seemed normal. That should be shocking to everyone who reads this. Imagine every teenager that you know experiencing what these teenagers have experienced."

This afternoon, members of Juveniles for Justice will also be sharing the Broken Bridges report with Philadelphia Department of Human Services Commissioner Cynthia Figueroa and other DHS officials. City Council recently convened a taskforce established to improve institutional conditions for youth in Philadelphia. This taskforce was created following a City Council hearing, convened by Councilmember Helen Gym, in which members of Juveniles for Justice shared some of the accounts that would eventually become Broken Bridges.

Juveniles for Justice dedicated last year to work around conditions in youth prisons and placements.

Youth advocates from the program as well as staff who oversee the program are available for comment.

Juveniles for Justice and its sister program Youth Fostering Change (a youth advocacy program for youth with experience in the child welfare system) are also celebrating ten years this year. Follow along for a glimpse of this celebration with #10YearsofYA.
